

We learn that four Indians from the Peninsula opposite Eureka, have volunteered their services and been accepted by Gen. Kibbe, to go in search of Redwood Indians. "Set a rogue to catch a rogue" is an old motto, and it applies with equal force to catching Indians; they frequently leave signs in their trails when traveling to keep out of the way of the whites, which are intended to designate certain things to their comrades, and can only be understood by Indians. In such cases Indians make serviceable allies.
