

The Indians.

On Thursday we visited the Indians in Yuba City in company with one or two gentlemen. It is not necessary for us to speak of their filth, and other circumstances connected with their miserable condition. We would rather ask is there no method by which they could be made useful to the whites, and improved themselves? In their council hall, as it is called, but more properly a deep dirty pit, with poles for banks, and every thing else in keeping, we saw three chiefs, and a dozen or more captains, large muscular men, squatted on the ground by bowls of acorn mush, or lazily lying in their bunks, with a few unraveling a red comfort, to bedeck themselves for some imbecile fandango.

• There is to us something so utterly abhorrent in the thought that they must waste away life, thus in activity, or by the more speedy process of dissipation, to which they are becoming addicted. Could not those who live among us, by some law be required to bind out their children to farmers and others, for a given period, so as to make them useful, and thus induct them to habits of cleanliness and industry.

This need not be done by coercive measures or means that will cause their dislike or excite their prejudice; but by overseers of the poor who will encourage them to it by presents and other means that will evidence to their minds that their welfare is sought. We merely make these suggestions to direct others to this subject, who may examine it in all its bearings, and if possible rescue them from their present useless and degraded condition.
