"The Savage Re-possessing his Hunting Grounds" Weekly Humboldt Times, April 27, 1861, p. 2, col. 3. The Savage Re-possessing his Hunt-

Under this head the San Francisco Evening Journal submits some remarks in reference to the Indians in Mendocino county, and the conduct of the government generally touching Indian affairs in this State, and as they apply equally to our own case we subjoin some extracts from the article alluded to:

It is the manifest policy of a wise government to afford the utmost protection to the outguards of civilization. It should joulously care for the lives and property of the adventurous ones who are onlarging its borders at the extreme peril of everything that is dear in life and household. Such has not been the practice of the United States Government; great sums are annually expended in the management of Indian affairs, but too generally under the immediate direction of individuals destitute of any knowledge of Indian character without humanity, and unpossessed of any fitness for the trust. Reservations are put under control of stipendiaries who transform tham to territories of speculation, and whose dishonest exactions become apparent even to the savage, who becomes aware that goods originally designed for his own comfort, are made a commodity of unauthorized The great highways to the commerce. border are unsecured by fort or blockhouse, or else are the londing places of its zy troops and inexperienced officers whose generalship is held in contempt by the Innians. Immense fortifications are constructed where there is no danger, whilethe perilious border is left to whatever protection can be offered by the settler's rifle.

The writer then alludes to the fact that many settlers in the northern part of Mendocino county "having besought protection in vain, are preparing to abandon their improvements, leaving a rich and inviting country to be re-claimed by savages"—"all must be given up after the hard labor of perilous years to the mendous Links whose uprestrained man-protection can be offered by the settlers.

Many of our people, we regret to say, have been quite impoverished by the "unrestrained maraudings" of the miserable diggers that have infested portions of this county. It is to be hoped, however, that the combined efforts of the regulars and colunteers now engaged against them will drive the last one from our borders, and thereby render the settlers in future safe and secure in their possessions.

The article concludes with the following reflections:

If Government is possessed of humane consideration for the Indian, its policy is to protect the settlement from his plundering, else the red man's extermination is inevitable. The aim of the backwoodsman's rifle is sure, and his purpose is fixed to possess the rich lands which the other is so reluctant to leave. The restless, wandering tribes cannot be kept on Reservations, near their old haunts; there is but one course to pursue—to remove them a great way off, whence they cannot get back without observation and resistance. If this be not done, they will waste away before the rifle and knife of the explorer: There is irrepressible exterminating war between the races, and the Indian's annihilation, sooner or later, is ordained._/
