Political Duels, and Illustrations Modern We have received a neat pamphlet from the House of Representatives, entitled "A Treatise on the MEXICO OF BROOKLYN," being a parody delivered by John W. Drayton, at the College of the New York University, in November last, upon receipt of the news of Senator Broderick's death. We make the following extract, relating to noted political duels, which took place in England within the last century.
 "Sheridan fought Mathews in 1772; Pitt fought Tierney in 1798; Fox fought Adam in 1779; Lord Castlereagh fought Canning in 1809; O'Connell fought and killed D'Esterre in 1815; Wellington challenged and fought the Earl of Winchelsea in 1779, and Peel challenged O'Connell in 1830. All of these duels, except that of Sheridan, were strictly political duels, growing out of political speeches or publications. It is move-over, worthy of particular remark, that in every of the most prominent of these instances—that of Wellington and Winchelsea—and that of O'Connell and D'Esterre—there was really no ground for challenge which the challenged party was bound to admit as valid. But the Duke of Wellington, having said in the House of Lords, "If I could avoid, by any sacrifice whatever, even one month of my life in order to do it," and the Earl of Winchelsea, afterward, using expressions which the Duke thought had a tendency to provoke a civil war, Wellington, acting under a feeling of conscientious indignation, and official responsibility, whose integrity and earnestness have never been disputed, challenged the Earl, and did his best to
