TRINITY DIGGINS, NEAR THE MOUTH OF
WEAVER CREEK, May 2, 1851.

MESSRS. EDITORS:—In looking over a Sacramento paper a few days since, I see it stated that "miners were doing exceedingly well on Trinity, making from twelve to twenty dollars a day, &c." It is all humbug, and I take this, my earliest opportunity of stamping it such, with a hope that it may be of benefit to many who, like myself in times past, are never satisfied, but must leave good diggins to follow reports and search for better. The average wages of this stream, I think, are not over six dollars at the most, as hundreds who have returned to the valley will bear me evidence; then why attempt thro' the public prints, to delude the poor hard working miner with such false statements. It is a shame.

A short time since some forty-seven mules belonging to miners on Big Bar were taken from the corral and driven off. On the discovery about the corral of numberless bare feet tracks a considerable excitement ensued, and every body was soon armed and prepared to take vengeance upon the Indians. They however in following their trail some two hundred yards, found where the thieves had pulled off their boots.— Eleven of them immediately set out to pursue, seven of whom before the first day was over, returned, whilst the rest continued, and for five days they travelled across the coast range without a mouthful to eat, fighting their way, as the thieves by some means or other put ed across the coast range without a mouthful to eat, fighting their way, as the thieves by some means or other put the Indians up to check every body that might be coming in pursuit. The four men however reached the Sacramento valley in five days with fourteen Indian scalps tied on a string, and followed the robbers down the South side of the Cottonwood creek, across the Sacramento, and found them in the forks of Antelope creek, a few miles below Ide's Ranch. The thieves as soon as they saw their pursuers fired upon them, but they fortunately escaping the deadly aim, leveled their pieces in turn and killed three. They scalped them, collected their mules, which were feeding a little distance off on the plains, and started immediately ~~back to this place.~~ One of the thieves they recognised as being one John Emory, and another was a tall red haired man by the name of Spafford, doubtless known by many below as a stock trader.

There was a large meeting in Weaverville a few days ago for the purpose of appointing delegates to the Whig Convention in San Francisco; speeches were made, and a good deal of enthusiasm manifested. Waldo, a man ~~who every body likes, was the choice~~ and preference, and will, from the manifestations here, outrun, if he accepts the nomination, one of these long ear'd rabbits. Maj. Redding has many friends in this part of the State, but I doubt not but what Waldo's friends equal him in numbers, whilst they are far more firm and tenacious.

My paper is almost out and for the present will close. Perhaps will write you again shortly.
