POLICY OF THE ADMINISTRATION.—The Washington correspondent of the Bulletin writes of the policy of the Lincoln Administration in suppressing the rebel forces: "I do not understand that the President proposes to invade, at once, Southern States to take possession of the forts. It is believed that a large body of men will go to Charleston as soon as they can be ready, and endeavor to take possession of the public property there. If this cannot be done before the middle of May or 1st of June, when disease is likely to decimate the troops of either side stationed on the shore, it is supposed that a well-manned fleet will lie off the harbor, out of the reach of the guns of Moultrie or Sumter, but in enough to compel Davis to keep a large body of men at Charleston for its defense. The effort in every way will be to bring the rebels to a sense of their error by letting them feel the pecuniary evils of war, rather than by slaughter. To this end the ports of all the Seceding States will be blockaded, and the troops summoned will be posted along the borders, in order to cut off the rebels from all communication in any direction. This would, of course, cut off their supplies from abroad, and speedily exhaust their limited resources at home. If, then, Jeff. Davis wants to wage battle, he will be compelled to seek it by exhaustive and expensive marches over long distances, only to be met by fresh forces, overwhelmingly superior to his own in numbers and appointments, and with illimitable resources at their back."

THE PRIVATEER QUESTION.
In referring to the issue of letters of marque by the Jeff. Davis Government, the Mobile Advertiser says:
"We have no real shipping interests to be imperiled. We have no employees of the sea to defend. We are not vulnerable on the ocean, but Lincoln's people are almost invulnerable. The sails of their sailing whiten every sea, and the navigation interests of that country involve an importance to its citizens second only to the importance of the cotton harvest with us. The gratification of that would be to the considerable section of country which thrives by, as the destruction of the entire cotton interest would be to this. To destroy that interest would imperish almost as many in the Eastern and Northern States, as the annihilation of the negroes and cotton plantations would in the South. These cannot be attacked, but the shipping can. There is no sea on which the ships of New England and New York do not cluster thickly, each one a rich prize for the daring privateer. Let the note of war be sounded, and soon hundreds of craft, bearing letters of marque from the Confederacy, would be scouring the ocean to prey upon the defenceless commerce of Lincoln's people. The enemy could not, in late in kind. We have no shipping, so to speak, to capture. If Lincoln makes war on us, he will have work enough for his little navy, without attempting to blockade our ports. He will need it all to drive merely the gates of his own ports, and drive off the fleet of privateers which will hover around to pounce on every vessel which shows itself, outward or inward bound."
