

LATER FROM PITT RIVER.—The following information in relation to the operations with the Indians on Pitt River, we find in the Yreka Chronicle of Aug. 27th:

From Lieut. McCall, U. S. A., we learn that Lieut. Crook had returned to Fort Crook from a ten days' scout in the Hat Creek country. On the third day out, the woods were accidentally fired, and the Indians taking the alarm, fled to the mountains. He succeeded in killing two of them in the pursuit, and took two prisoners.

Lieut. C. is in a fair way of conquering a peace with the Pitt River and Hat Creek Indians, which their late experience will convince them, will be worth preserving. Already he has induced a number to come in and sue for peace, and it is expected that, in a few days, what remains of these tribes will surrender. He has pursued them into their rugged mountain fastnesses, through brakes and tules, and routed them with great loss, on the part of the Indians; and the severe lesson—the first they have ever received—has taught them that a peace is worth keeping.

Col. Buchanan was highly complimented by the War Department, for his successful conduct of the Rogue River War. It is believed that Lieut. Crook's small command have killed as many Indians in the present campaign, as were killed in Col. B.'s campaign on Rogue River in 1856, and he merits a like honorable recognition from the War Department.
