

Alarm of the Mission Indians.

A gentleman direct from San Louis Rey, informs us that the Indian residents of Temacólu, a village situated at the base of the mountains, twenty-five miles east of the Mission of San Louis, and on the emigrant road leading from Warner's to Los Angeles, are moving their families and stock to this city, their chief, Pablo, having declined to join Antonio in his foray against the whites. Pablo is an educated Indian, the owner of a fine rancho, and large herds of cattle. He may be expected here this evening. The entire country is alarmed, and without prompt assistance from the North, our situation in a short time may become critical.— The Government depot in this city, containing an immense amount of public property, is entirely unprotected, and of course liable to be destroyed at any moment. We are aware that Gen'l Hitchcock's hands are in a measure tied for the want of troops, but we trust to his well known energy and skill to relieve us in some way from the danger that now threatens us.
