

HORRIBLE MASSACRE BY INDIANS.—We are indebted to Mr. Magary, Adams & Co's express messenger, for the following account of a most horrible murder committed by Indians upon two Americans and thirteen Chinamen. It seems that two Americans named Guild and Ingolls, with a party of nineteen Chinamen, were on a prospecting tour at McCloud's river, about twenty miles east of Pittsburgh, and while encamped, with their guns stacked near them, a large party of Indians came into their camp. As they appeared to be friendly, no alarm was felt, until, on a sign from the chief, they suddenly seized upon the guns and rushed towards the hills with them. Ingolls seized a club and struck the hindermost Indian, knocking him down; the Indians immediately faced round and delivered a murderous fire upon the unarmed party. Six of the Chinamen escaped and made their way to Pittsburgh. A party of Americans started out immediately, and found the body of Ingolls with an arm cut off at the elbow and his head horribly mutilated with stones. They also found the bodies of thirteen Chinamen, three of which were mutilated in like manner as Ingolls. Guild's body could not be found. They followed bloody tracks which they supposed to be his, and also saw marks of an axe with which he probably defended himself until driven into the river.—From appearances, the Chinamen, although unarmed, must have fought like tigers, as the ground bore evidence of a desperate struggle.
