

Later from the Indian War.

THE Shasta Courier says: "We are informed by Mr. Horsely Cram, Rogers & Co.'s express messenger, that John D. Colden, messenger from Col. Alden, arrived in Yreka just before he left, bearing the intelligence that Col. Alden was yet alive, although in an extremely critical condition. He was shot with an half ounce ball, while stooping behind a log, just in the act of firing at an Indian. The ball entered his neck near the jugular vein, and came out just below the arm on the opposite side of his body, inflicting a ghastly wound of sufficient size to enable a man to thrust two fingers into it. Just about the time he fell, the old chief Sam stepped out and proposed a parley with the "Big Boston," when another gentleman was sent to him in the place of the colonel. The result of this talk was, that some dozen of the whites were permitted to enter the Indian camp, where they observed the dead bodies of twelve Indians piled up ready to be burned. The Indians asked them to make a treaty, and the whites had agreed to meet at Table Rock in a few days and talk over the matter. The probability was, that on that day either a treaty would be formed or a general battle take place.

Some of Sam's Indians packed Col. Alden some sixty miles from the battle ground, and within 12 miles of Jacksonville, where he now lies.
