Indian Hostilities.—To all who have traveled through the portions of country about Tshastl mountain, the head waters of Pit, Klamath, and Rogue Rivers, the inveterate hostility of the Indian tribes there is well known, and so successful have they been in attacking small parties of emigrants that they are become emboldened beyond their natural character. Col. Kearny, in moving through that portion of the country, enroute from Oregon to this State, with the men of the Rifle Regiment that were transferred to the Dragoon and Artillery companies here, has been attacked by them, as the following account from the Oregon Spectator will show. Lieut. Stewart, who has been killed, was through the Mexican war, and was Brevetted Captain for his services there—he was well known to us as an intelligent and promising officer, whose pride of profession was beautifully illustrated in his dying exclamations, that “it was too bad to have survived the Mexican war to be killed by a merciless savage.”
